

U.S. Representative Miller Boosts Image In Washington

Brad Miller

U.S. Rep. Brad Miller of North Carolina's 13th District is making his mark on Washington as he gears up for a re-election bid.

The first-term Democrat represents a district of haves and have-nots. The eastern side of his district includes North Raleigh and its well-heeled professionals and politicians. Also in the district are the displaced textile and furniture employees of Rockingham and Guilford Counties and hosiery operations in Alamance and Guilford counties.

A former state senator, Miller was identified with the leadership circles and now he is creating a reputation for constituent service and thoughtful approach to domestic issues. He was successful in getting $23 million in the federal highway bill for projects in his district.

"The jobs these projects will create cannot be outsourced," he said.

In early April, he was featured as the House Member of the Week on the Democrats' House of Representatives website, and in January he was selected to give the party response to President Bush's 2005 budget with its record deficit.

In his message to residents of the 13th district recently, Miller insisted "Congress needs to address issues that affect America's future: making Americans secure at home and abroad, protecting jobs and creating new ones, making health care accessible and affordable..."

"We've got to restore fiscal responsibility to the federal budget. We've got to focus on the priorities of families in North Carolina and across the country. I hope we can put partisanship aside and do what's right by ordinary Americans," Miller said.
